Mike O'Connor is a procrastinating student in a very difficult major (neuroscience). He gets stressed because he doesn't know a lot of people in his classes to talk to about the material.

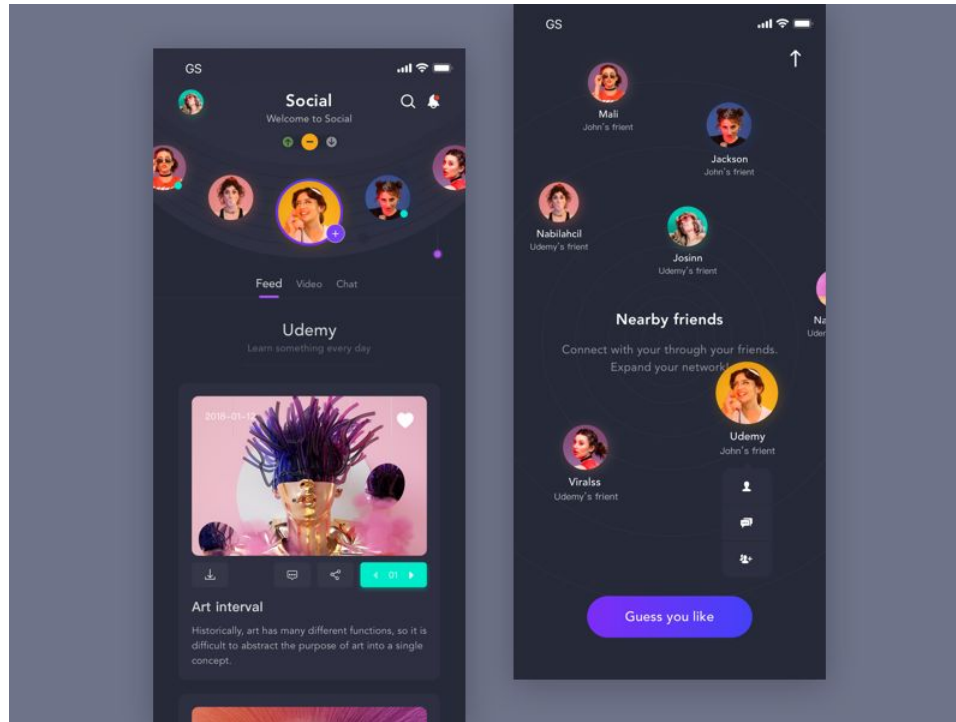

One day, Mike's sister suggested that he try the new study group app, where your classmates are paired with you based on your classes and interests.

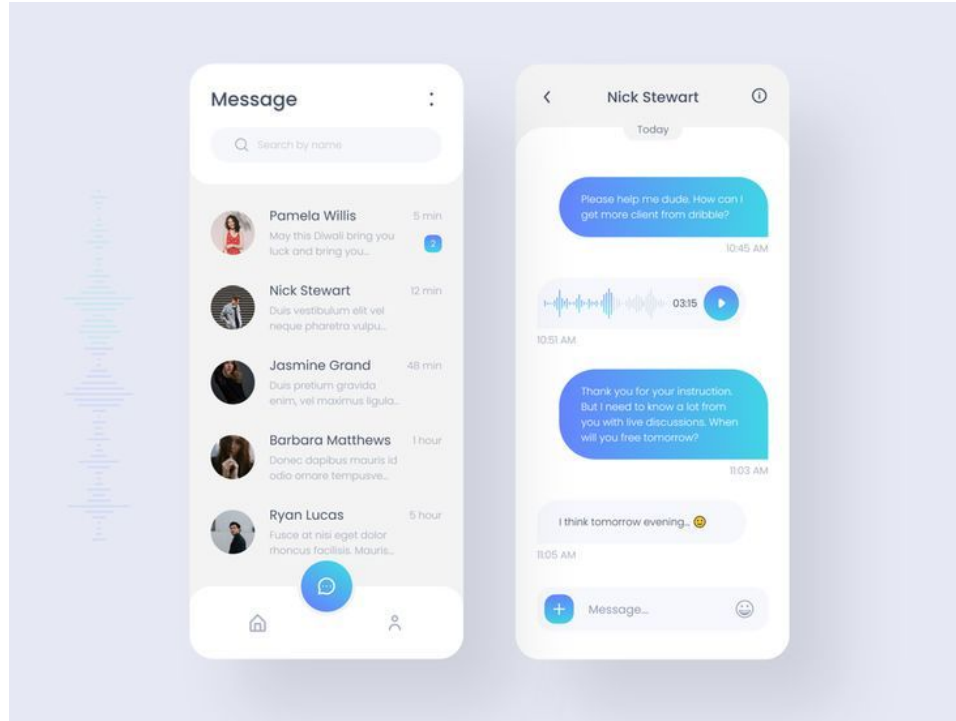

Mike was thrilled! Not only would this be an opportunity for him to improve his understanding of difficult concepts, but he could finally make some friends too!

Mike creates an account on the app, inputting his name, college (or high school), interests, and hobbies. He also inputs his classes and how confident he feels in each one.

Immediately, Mike is matched with similar students in similar majors who are also looking for study groups.

Mike clicks a button to organize the students based on ideal groups for specific classes and hobbies. The app then allows Mike to reach out to specific students via the messaging system.

Mike reaches out, and to his surprise, he is instantly met with responses from other struggling students.

The next day, Mike meets a group of 4 students, and soon to be friends, in the library where they study for their upcoming exam.

Samuel has always had trouble when it comes to studying. He could never focus, and all of his friends were slackers so they never wanted to study with him. Samuel needed some study buddies.

He went to google and searched “tinder but for study buddies” and came across the app called “Study Group App”. He had found just what he was looking for.

He downloaded the app, and after a quick and easy method of verification, he was able to locate study groups across all different kinds of subjects.

He searched for Calculus, which was what he was struggling with and immediately found a couple of local study groups with vacant member slots.

Samuel wasn't too sure how safe the meeting up of strangers would be, but he was quickly reassured by the apps verification process and the friendly pictures of all his potential groupmates.

He traveled to the meetup spot and after seeing the people he saw on his phone, he clicked a button which sent all the groupmates a notification asking “is this your groupmate?”, to which they all replied yes.

Samuel had finally found a study group that could help him in his calculus class and all of his problems were solved. It was all thanks to the Study Group App.

The Average Class Day for Timmy

By Alex Lacson

Timmy wakes up in the morning with a pounding headache. He has been studying night and day for his upcoming midterms next week.

Timmy gets up and goes to class 15 minutes late. Once he gets there, he realizes that his professor is introducing a new concept and it will be on the midterm next week.

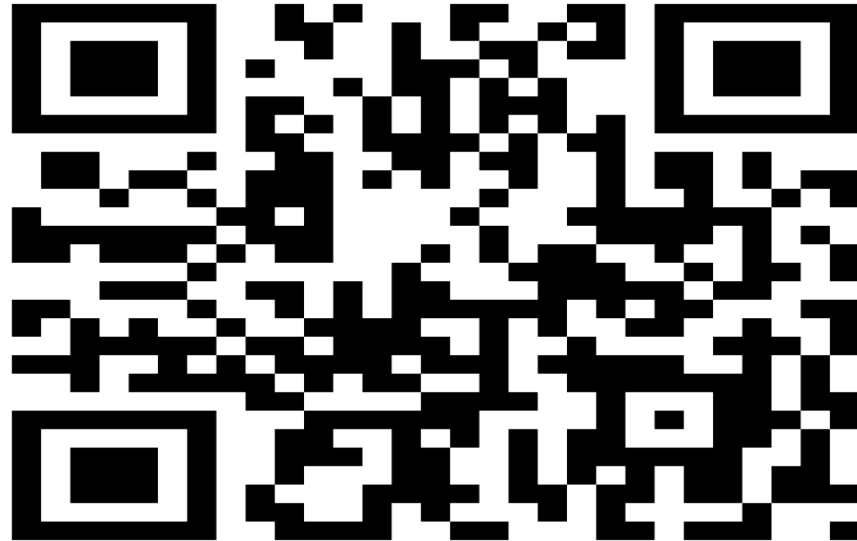

Timmy panics and loses his composure and bursts out of the classroom because he is already completely lost and does not know anybody in the class to get notes from Unfortunately, Timmy trips over and hits his head on the water fountain. While getting up, he looks at the wall and sees a QR code to download the Study Group App.

Timmy frantically pulls out his phone and scans the QR code and signs up for the Study Group App services.

After using the app, Timmy found a good study group in his class and made good friends with them. He passed all of his midterms the week after and does not feel lost anymore

Chad Brewski failed yet another economics exam. He didn't study because he chose to harass the pledges and make them do funny tiktok dances. Chad needed to pass to keep his GPA eligible to stay in his beloved fraternity.

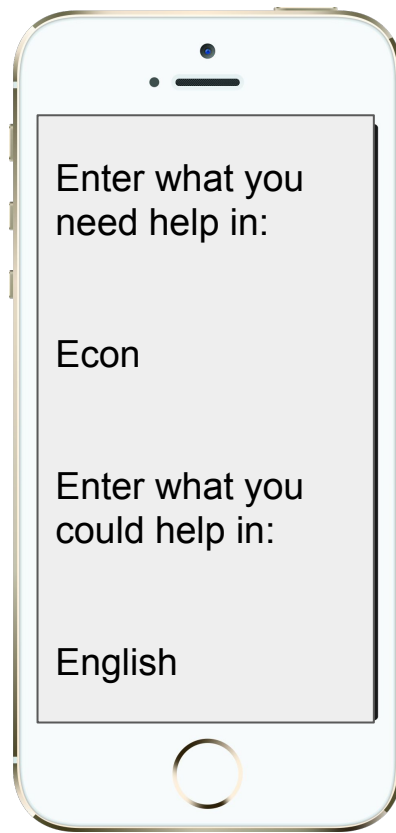

Chad went to his frat house later that day to toss some dye with the boys. Chad was in bad spirits, and told the boys that he failed an exam again. His brother, Thad, a very studious individual with a 3.8 GPA, said that Chad is in serious danger of being ineligible and should try and find a study group. Chad isn't very resourceful, and didn't know how.

Thad told Chad that he should try this new app that he found that helps you find study groups. “It’ll match you with people who are strong in whatever you’re struggling in so they can help you get better,” Thad explained to Chad.

Thad showed Chad how to work the app, starting with entering what he struggled with, and what his academic strengths were. Chad then entered his schedule and what time he would prefer to study.

The app generated a bunch of students who could potentially study with Chad, and he found someone who could help him with econ. Chad is also pretty good at English, so he could help him as well. Chad had decided to study with this guy. He did the same thing a few more times, and found a good study group.

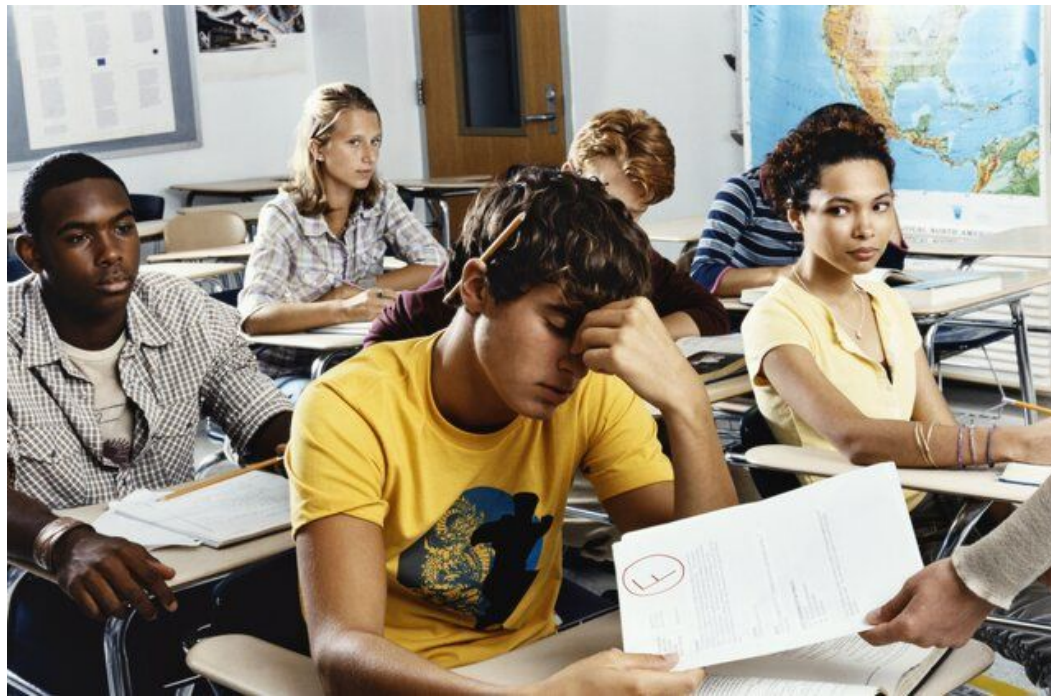

According to all of the data on each student, the app offered Tuesday as the most efficient night to study. Chad and his group met every Tuesday at the library, and Chad ended up passing his exam.

Eli Snake is a very quiet and soft spoken college freshman who has begin to have trouble in his first semester finance classes

He has yet to meet many friends as he has a fear of stepping out of his comfort zone, so he spends most of his time alone procrastinating.

As he takes his daily reddit scroll he comes across a forum promoting this new app.

That app is a study grouping app that pairs one to a group of people with the same major, school, and assignments that they can all collaborate on.

This gives Eli the chance to overcome his failing grades with a group of people he can work with as well as a group of people he can potentially become friends with. Two birds one stone

Eli begins using the app, and he finds a group of people that go to the same school as well as the same major, so they begin talking and becoming acquainted with one another

After a while of texting, they all meet up and becomes friends and now help each other succeed in their classes
